1 In a construction project, local residents are upset about noise and traffic — according to the Salience Model, what type of stakeholders are they, and how should you manage them?

Answer:
They are Dependent Stakeholders — they have legitimacy (their community is affected) and urgency (their concerns need immediate attention), but no real power to influence the project directly.

Management Strategy:

- Manage Closely — maintain regular communication, address their concerns, and involve them in discussions to avoid conflicts or resistance.
- Provide updates about noise control measures and mitigation plans.

2 A CEO has high power but low interest in project details. Which Power–Interest Grid quadrant does she belong to, and what should you do?

Answer:
The CEO falls under the "Keep Satisfied" quadrant.

Explanation:

- High power, meaning she can influence major decisions.
- Low interest, meaning she doesn't need day-to-day details.

Management Strategy:

- Keep her satisfied with periodic high-level updates.
- Highlight key achievements, project progress, and major risks, but avoid overloading her with technical details.

3 If a stakeholder has urgent needs but no power or legitimacy, what category are they in and how do you handle them?

Answer:
They are Demanding Stakeholders in the Salience Model.

Explanation:

- They have urgency but lack power and legitimacy.

- Their influence is limited, but they can be noisy or persistent.

Management Strategy:

- Keep Informed, but don't dedicate excessive time.
- Listen to their concerns politely and document their feedback to maintain transparency and goodwill.

4 Suppose the Marketing Manager has high interest but moderate power — what communication strategy should be used?

Answer:
He falls under the "Keep Informed" category of the Power–Interest Grid.

Management Strategy:

- Maintain regular communication and share updates about timelines and deliverables.
- Engage him through reports, meetings, or emails to align marketing activities with project progress.
- Ensure he feels involved and valued, which helps in maintaining internal cooperation.
